Schoonover was a most popular member, one might almost say the leader, of her set. That is to say, she was fair, thin, and thirty-five, and spent most of her time at clubs, charity bazars, and concerts. Besides dominating her husband and the other domestics, she enjoyed smoking, drank cocktails, and played bridge, not as a game, but scientifically. It was her profession. Some people actually went so far as to attribute her remarkable skill to dexterity of the hand; but always behind her back. One morning she was on the chaise longue of her boudoir, when the maid, French, and therefor pretty, entered with the mornings mail. For a little while madame continued fondling the silken ear of her pet spaniel; then she put him on the floor with an admonishing pat and stretched luxuriously, revealing shapely, white arms, as the pink silk sleeves of her kimona fell back. Then she went through the mail. Suddenly she sat up with a start, holding in her well-manicured hand a stiff, white envelope, from which she had taken a crisp, crackling ten-dollar bill. It was not the money which had thus broken her careless pose, but the letter which accompanied it. It read thus: Nov. 18, 1917. Mrs. C. S. Dear Madam: Enclosed you will find a Ten Dollar bill. It is a sample of those which we are turning out by our new process, which enables us to counterfeit money so accurately that even...
