I attended in January last a case of pneumonia, in which the water supply had been limited, though the patient urgently demanded it, because there was occasional sick stomach. This was prior to having charge of the case. Almost my first proceeding was to give the patient a watery saturation so to speak. by allowing him to drink what he thought satisfied him, then by coaxing getting nearly as much more swallowed; very little came back by vomiting, the want was cancelled, and the water supply was kept up by lemonade during the remainder of the time he was under professional notice. T often give water as hot as it can be swallowed in large volume, say one to three pints, or more at a time to flood or saturate the system. In doing so it is better to make it palatable with common salt. It should be strictly boiling and sipped from tablespoon, or small ladle, blowing each portion with the mouth until it can be swallowed without scalding. As it is thus introduced very gradually, a very large amount can be taken without sick stomach or sense of fullness. It is absorbed in the blood-vessel system, the volume and frequency of the pulse becoming more natural in a very marked degree, followed by a glow of...
