Not illustrated. 1874 Excerpt: . . . 16th day, the pulse was 120, temperature 104, and there was slight delirium. On the 24th day the pulse was 116, temperature 102. On the 27th she resumed full diet, and left the hospital on the 42nd day. This case illustrates the general conclusion to be derived from the whole of the foregoing cases, viz. that if it be conceded that aconite ameliorates the febrile condition, it does not much control it; and it further shows that it cannot in any degree anticipate or cut short the pyrexial stage in a disease against which, if it did possess the antifebrifuge properties ascribed to it, its influence ought to be most marked. I have said nothing respecting the action of aconite on the secretions, for I have but little evidence The frothy mucus (improperly called saliva) which appears in the mouth as one of the earliest symptoms of aconite poisoning, is an exsudation from the congested mucous membrane of the fauces and gullet, being chiefly forced up from the latter by the forcible contractions of its muscles. Afterwards there is usually a little trickling of clear glairy mucus, which is no doubt derived from the general mucous surface as well as from the glands contained within and beneath it. In the dog the exsudation of this clear fluid is much more copious under the influence of morphia. In Obs. 4 a large quantity of very acid fluid was found in the stomach, and it seems to have...
